Dance and Track Meet to Feature Program on April 16.

For the first time in the history of Louisiana State university a holiday will be observed in honor of the university's athletes of all time. Saturday, April 16, has been designated by the "L" club, composed of men who have done outstanding work in athletics and who have been awarded in recognition of their work, in conjunction with the university authorities as the day which the university shall celebrate as "L" day. Old athletes and those who are in school at present will assemble at their Alma Mater to be honored by their friends and schoolmates. A track meet in the afternoon between L. S. U. and the University of Alabama will be the main event of the day and it will probably bring reminiscences of past meets to former track stars who will be there to witness the event. A dance sponsored by the "L" club will be held at the gymnasium that night, concluding the celebration. Permission for a parade of the cadet corps on Saturday is not expected to be obtained. It is planned to make "L" day an annual event.

L. S. U. Faculty Members Express Their Views on Current Topics

The dean of the college of commerce at Louisiana State university, Dr. J. B. Trant, gives his views on the causes of the present depression and advocates moves that will bring about financial normalcy. He states that the basis of our economic structure is a result of the World War, when an unequal distribution of the gold supply caused a number of nations to abandon the gold standard, necessarily enabling them to buy from us with gold.

"Government interference with business," he continued, "tended also to cripple our industries and hinder progress. The billion dollar tax bill just passed by congress will not bring prosperity, although it will enable the government to carry on its business, and is better than borrowing money to balance the budget."

He says that the regaining of the world's financial normalcy does not depend upon any one country, but upon the moves of all. "When deflation has been carried through every phase of economic organization, and the world becomes sane, settles down to an average manufacturing output, and carries on international trade with the distribution of gold, employment will increase, the restoration of confidence will result, and prosperity will follow."

"America is today ready to move forward," the dean contended, "but she cannot do so by herself. All the world must move together. A number of other nations are willing to join the parade to prosperity also, but their economic structure will not permit."

Stating the possibility that the bottom of the depression was reached in the middle of March, he further declared that the decline may go on for several months, depending largely upon international politics, international trade, and the distribution of gold.

In answer to the question of whether this depression is equaled by others in history, he affirmed that it is indeed. "The one from 1873 to 1896 was decidedly more critical."

Major Frey. In a recent interview Thursday, Maj. Fred C. Frey, dean of men at the Louisiana State university, declared that in his opinion the younger generation and the college students in particular were certainly not going to the dogs.

"The college students of today," he said, "are, if anything, better prepared mentally, morally, and physically to make a success of life. They have been accused of being a fast, loose-living crowd, but in my opinion they are much slower, saner, and wiser than their brothers and sisters outside the university."

In answer to a question as to the methods he used in dealing with students and if it were possible to deal with them as one business man with another, he made the following statement: "I do not deal with students as I would with business men. I deal with them as student to student. You have to be a leader to deal with students. I would much rather try to drive or fool a business man than a college student. College students know what they want, they are wise, they can't be fooled, and they are the best judges of human nature I have found anywhere. You cannot drive them. You must lead them and reason with them. College students are anything but a bunch of children."

When asked which of the two, women or men students, he would rather deal with, he explained that there was not much choice. He believes that women are as intelligent as men but that their fields are more restricted than those of men.

"Statistics show us," he continued, "that in intelligence women average about the same while that of men ranges from very low to very high. There are very few dumbbells and very few geniuses among women while there is a much greater number of both among men."

There is, in his opinion, more drinking among students today than before prohibition. In his estimation, there are very few drunks among college students. "Students," he explained, "usually confine their drinking to special occasions such as dances, football games, etc. and only a very small percentage are disorderly even on these occasions. The average college student is a well-mannered, well-dressed individual. The so-called collegiate man is an exception rather than the rule. Very few students can wear funny clothes and silly hats without making fools of themselves but those who can do so successfully are usually an asset to the university."

Maj. Frey is still a young man. He has a smile and a friendly nod for everyone and can call nearly every student by name. He is always neatly dressed and intelligent and friendliness gleam behind his quick, piercing eyes. When you walk into his office, you just have a feeling that you are in the presence of a friend and when he looks up and says, "Well, son, what's your trouble this morning?" then you know he's a friend. No black scowls and mean looks from him. Frank, open, smiling, he waits to hear your side of the question and then he tells his. He laughs with you over your troubles and over his troubles and he does all in his power to help you and even if he kicks you out of school, you go out knowing that Major kicked you out because he had to, not because he wanted to and there's no hard feelings. And Major can be hard. The boys know that even though he's laughing when he tells you that you had better get back to work he really means you had better get to work and they all like him and respect him for it. In the words of the boys on the campus, "The major's a prince of a fellow."

Major Middleton. Maj. Troy H. Middleton, commandant of cadets at Louisiana State university, believes that military training makes pacifists who are willing to fight for peace. He is opposed to the United States being a member of the League of Nations.

"As to whether I believe military training makes pacifists lies in the definition of pacifists. If pacifists are those who want this country to remain at peace and are willing to go to war to see that it remains at peace, then I'm a pacifist and military training makes pacifists. But if pacifists are those who will not go to war to obtain peace then I'm not a pacifist," he said.

It is pointed out that the training is of value even more in peace than in war. The cadet benefits physically, possesses discipline, patriotism, self-control and other qualities that make good citizens. Major Middleton states, "I'm opposed to the League of Nations because it would make us go to war when any member of the league would do so. I'm opposed to going to war for any such reasons." The reason for certain countries today having large armies is accounted for by their desire to either gain new territory or for protection. Major Middleton believes that we should be prepared to protect ourselves.

"I say that the popularity of military training is increasing in R. O. T. C. units by judging from the large number of applications wishing to remain in the work for four years. We always have more than we can keep for advanced courses," he said.

The unit at L. S. U. increased from 172 to over 3,100 at the beginning of the present regular session. Surveys made by the department of interior of university presidents and graduates of units during the past decade indicate that military training in colleges and universities is desirable.

Today's Anniversary

On April 12, 1918, Field Marshal Sir Douglas Haig issued an order to British troops on the front in the Lys sector to "fight it out to the end."

the Lys sector, German storm troops pushed them back after a day of terrific fighting.
